Mindfulness and Stress

Mindfulness is a 2500-year-old form of meditation. It was first an essential part of many famous philosophies such as Taoism, Yoga, and Buddhism. Now, mindfulness has been in the spotlight of Western psychology. It is well known for its clinically proven abilities that cure chronic pain, substance abuse, PTSD, OCD, borderline personality disorder, depression, anxiety disorders and of course, stress.

It is used worldwide by teachers, workplace consultants, coaches and psychologists to develop the utmost presence to the here-and-now.

Mindfulness is the pathway to a greater consciousness. Greater consciousness is the road to a peaceful mind, which is the pathway to happiness. And happiness is the pathway to the healthier spiritual, mental, and emotional aspects of life.

Mastering mindfulness is not a one shot process. But the process itself has its own purpose. The process of mindfulness puts emphasis to slowly learning because no shortcuts will make you adept at it until effort, dedication, time, and attention is devoted to it.
