Not illustrated. 1883 Excerpt: ... for the place which he holds in the estimation of Protestants. Other men have been his equals in all these respects. Some have been even his superiors; but we do not hold such celebrations as this in their honour. There have been in every land philosophers, orators, statesmen, scholars, poets, who in their own departments have surpassed him, and we give to them no stinted praise; but yet no such enthusiasm as we feel to-night thrills us at the mention of their names, because each of them wrought with agents which had only an earthly potency and a restricted range. L It was the merit of Luther that he set free the word of God, and because that is a divine agent and touches the main springs of individual, social, and national life, his influence has gone further and struck deeper than that of any other man in modern history. Great as he unquestionably was, his work was greater than himself, because the instrument in his hands, as in Paul's, was that gospel which is "the power of God." Hence the celebration of this four hundredth anniversary of his birth is fully more a tribute to the Scriptures than it is to himself. We honour him not merely for what he was, but mainly because he digged again the well which for centuries had been stopped up. We cherish his memory not simply because of the qualities which he manifested in his great life-battle, but because by that battle he secured for us the liberty to read and interpret the Bible for ourselves; and so all that we owe to it helps to swell our tribute to him. We venerate him, but we glorify God in him; for he would have been no more to us than many other men, not so much perhaps as some pther mpn, If he-Had not unsealed for us the fountaifiSf the.Sorjphires. «2i © C O.2..
